The author reflects on Queen Elizabeth 2, a Queen in the World

Sixty years on, her staying power has given the Queen a personal knowledge of global leaders unmatched by any other person alive. She has had, as house-guests, such near-mythic figures as Emperor Haile Selassie, General de Gaulle, Lech Walesa and Nelson Mandela; controversial twentieth-century monarchs such as the

- 5 Shah of Iran, Emperor Hirohito of Japan and King Faisal of Saudi Arabia; tyrants such as Ceaușescu of Romania and Mugabe of Zimbabwe; key first-generation African leaders such as Tanzania's Julius Nyerere, Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia, Mobutu Sese Seku of Zaire and Daniel arap Moi of Kenya; and central figures in 10 Russian history such as Marshal Bulganin, Nikita Khrushchev (who took tea with her and found her to his surprise 'completely unpretentious') and Vladimir Putin. A short book could be written just about her relations with US presidents from Truman and Eisenhower, through to Kennedy, Nixon and Reagan, to the Obamas today.

'Reader No. 1' has seen every significant secret Foreign Office cable or telegram, and much of the MI6 advice, about international crises and problems from 15 the 1950s onwards. As head of state of fifteen nations other than the United Kingdom, she has taken her overseas queenships very seriously. As head of the Commonwealth, she has had a ringside, inside seat for the epic stories of the Indian subcontinent, African decolonisation and the transformation of Asia. [...]

20 Most of her intercourse with world leaders has been at the level of the polite and uncontroversial exchange of expressions of goodwill. Her job is to meet, to listen but not to interrogate. She is Britain's Department of Warmth, the Secretary of State for Friendship. The records of her long and frequent visit to other countries contain endless pictures of singing groups of children, cheering crowds, banquets and march-pasts. A gorgeous cavalcade of dresses, often by Norman Hartnell or Hardy
25 Amies, and hats, dresses or bags, shows the care taken to reflect local sensibilities.

The presents received, paintings, silver and goldware, jewellery, strange carved crocodiles and thrones and the rest, would fill a warehouse.

It is a curious business, this endless exchanging of gifts. Around the world, the corridors and studies of presidents, prime ministerial offices, and anterooms of official 30 headquarters are stuffed with glass cases containing ceremonial swords, strangely ugly ceramics or models made of silver. They are grand clutter which always need dusting. Hardly any provide pleasure. There are exceptions: Nelson Mandela gave Prince Philip a hand-painted chess set of African figures which would make anyone smile. Some are particularly ugly and pointless: who would want a gilt model oil-rig 35 on a stand in a glass box from Saskatchewan ? But this is to miss the point. Gift-giving goes back to the earliest recorded human civilisations. It is a ritual to confirm lack of hostility, lack of war. Today the exchange of gifts is oil to smooth negotiations, balm for disappointing answers or grease to elicit better ones.

Question A

Buckingham Palace organises an exhibition to display the eclectic collection of gifts received by the Queen from over 100 countries. Imagine you are the guide to this exhibition and make a general presentation of it to visitors, explaining why it is important.

Question B

Is the exchange of gifts enough to maintain peace and improve relations between groups of people?
