Gender Divide In Household Labor

Anthony and Jenny Naglieri still get their 2 1/2-year-old daughter ready every morning. But instead of the pre-pandemic routine of taking her to daycare, Jenny now brings her to her mother's house. That's where Jenny, 33, an occupational therapist, has set up shop to do teletherapy during the pandemic, while her mother watches her daughter.

Meanwhile, Anthony, 35, who transitioned from a job that required a daily three-hour commute to a new, exciting position at a startup, puts his head down in work at home. The new role demands a lot of long hours and focus, he said, but he loves it.

The Naglieris, who live in Maryland, are still trying to find a rhythm that works when it comes to housework. And they're trying to get there quickly, because the couple are expecting their second baby in January. "Negotiating [housework] is one of the major things that has annoyed us about the pandemic," Anthony said.

Jenny agrees with this assessment. "Sometimes I think Anthony doesn't realize that when I'm at my mom's house, and she's watching our daughter, I'm still working all day. Because I go to my mom's to work, and then I come home and find I still need to prepare dinner, or throw in laundry, or put away things, even though he's the one at home. I am trying to be understanding because he's putting in the hours for the new job, but it can be frustrating," she told me. [...]

20 Jenny described their differing approaches to housework like this: "I feel like if I'm home, I would still make it a priority in between the work I'm doing to put away dishes, or tidy up, or quickly throw in a load of laundry. It would be in my line of vision, and I wouldn't be able to let it go. Whereas it doesn't often occur¹ to Anthony."

Gender Equity Starts in the Home

5 Jack Koban, a geologist and engineering project manager, is working from home during the pandemic shutdown while his wife, Ashley Saucier, works long hours as a pediatric emergency medicine physician. In our recent call with Jack, he reflected, "I don't remember the last time I've cooked three meals a day and done the dishes for three straight weeks. It's been nice being home, having more family time, and being more involved with the kids. We've definitely achieved a new work-life balance."

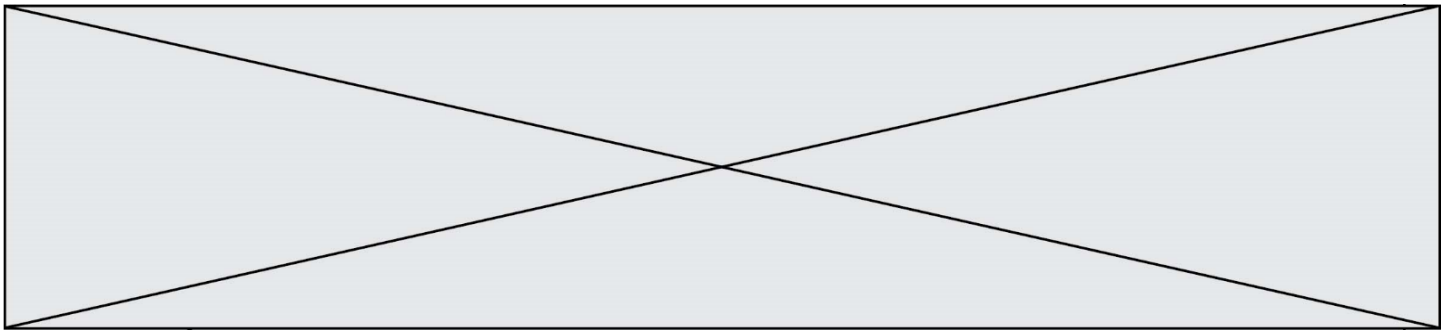

10 Not everyone is seeing a silver lining² in the shutdown, though. Families are struggling with unemployment, keeping small businesses afloat, and having to work to survive in the absence of paid sick leave. What's more, many individuals are now discovering what it's like to spend so much of their time managing work, childcare, and a household.

For most women, this last challenge is nothing new. Despite the fact that women outnumber³ men in the paid workforce, women still do more of the domestic work and childcare — almost twice as much as their male partners.

¹ to occur : to come to mind

² a silver lining : something positive that comes out of a bad situation

³ women outnumber men : there are more women than men

- 15 Many men teleworking from home for the first time are getting a front row seat to the daily demands of running a home and caring for kids, as well as a crash course in learning to “balance” work and family. Although many men have experienced traditional role reversals for short stints, most have never worked from home for an extended period while leaning in as primary caregiver for children.
